SOME THINGS THAT WORRY A MAN ON THE DESK AT NIGHT.

An Indianapolis Hotel Man Tells of Some Interesting Things Under His Observation.

"I want a room on the second floor, and I want my sample rooms ready by 7 o'clock in the morning sharp," said a big man, as he leaned heavily on the desk of an Indianapolis hotel late the other night. "And, say, I want a fire in the room and, by the way, you might take up a pitcher of ice water." This to the negro lad who approached at the call, "Front." Then the big man scowled illnaturedly in the face of the clerk and followed the boy to the elevator.

"That's only one of the things a night clerk has to contend with," observed the dapper gentleman behind the desk. Then he posed so that his diamond would catch the to the secretary. glare of the electric light at the proper angle and proceeded to ruminate.

"Oh, well, they say it takes all kinds of people to make a world, and I guess we get | but I had a clincher. I noticed that the secmost every kind in a hotel. Everything that happens around a big hostelry comes at night, you know. If a man's going to commit suicide he's bound to wait till night to do it, and it's the night clerk that has to of the transom frame. There was the mark first see the ghastly sight. And, by the way, did it ever occur to you how superstitious people really are. Suppose we have a suicide in this hotel and it gets out. The traveling | bie. The theatrical women recognized a big public hears of it, and if there's a superstitious set on earth, it's the traveling public. For months after the thing happens we can't | I never have seen the secretary since." get anybody to occupy that room. Traveling men get hold of the number some way, and we can't fool them. We have to change the number, and then lots of them will ask: "That ain't the suicide room, is it?" Well, we hotel men haven't the heart to lie to people, and we 'fess up. Then there is the number '13,' which nobody will have. Why It is I don't know, but it's true. We haven't a number '12' in this house, and if we had it wouldn't be used. Oh, there are a thousand and one annoyances that night clerks have to contend with. The man you just saw go up stairs is a pretty fair specimen of the night traveler. They come in here off the d, tired and sleepy, and out of humor. Of course, the night clerk gets the worst

"The bane of the night clerk's life is that electric button in every guest's room. All he has to do is to push it and there is a boy ready to attend his wants. You have no idea how that little invention is abused. People seem to think that it has a bell boy attached to it, and that this boy works automatically. They ring for everything, and at all hours of the night. Theatrical people are the worst, and particularly, theatrical women. One woman can cause more hard work than ten men. Theatrical women seem to require more attention than any other class of people, too. Two or three members of an opera company stopped here a few weeks ago, and I wan't to tell you that they led us a merry chase. One of the women had to have her room changed three times in one day. We gave her the best room in the house to start with, but she didn't like the style of the furniture. We finally suited her without buying a new outfit entirely. You see these gray hairs in my head? Well, I got them all in one night. You see this cabinet here at the side of the safe? We use that for packages of value that are brought in by the guests. The cabinet stands just back of the desk and, of course, I can keep my eye on it. One night this winter a jewelry drummer came in here late and swung his sample case onto the desk.

STORY OF LOST TREASURE. "There's $12,000 in that case,' he said, and I want you to take mighty good care of it for me.' I sent the gentleman to bed, and instead of placing his case in the cabinet where it belonged, I stowed it under the desk at my feet. I was busy just at that moment, and thought it would be safe there until I had time to lock it up. After a while the rush eased up and I sat down with my back to the cabinet. Suddenly I thought of that $12,000 jewelry case which had been left in my charge. Now, it didn't occur to me that I had put it under the desk, and I opened the cabinet mechanically. Of course the case wasn't there. For about a minute I felt like a man who has been hit with a sandbag, I imagine, I didn't just remember having put the case in the cabinet, but supposed, of course, I had done so. Then I made up my mind that one of two things had happened. Either the case had been stolen, or the owner had come down and got it. I called a porter and told him to get into that man's room without any cost and find out if that case was there. The porter did his work well, and I sweat blood while he was gone. Of course he didn't find the case, and I sat down to think. I never want to pass through the same experience again. I sat there for three hours, and at last made up my mind that I had been robbed. I also made up my mind that I had better get out, and was on the point of making my preparations for flight when the whole thing came to me like a flash, There was the case under the desk just where I had put it. In all my twenty years' experience as a hotel man that night was the worst I ever had. "There are some pleasant things in the life of a hotel clerk, and once in a while comething very funny turns up. About the most ridiculous right experience I ever had was in Louisville two or three years ago. I had the night 'trick' in one of the biggest hotels in town. This affair happened during the week of a Y. M. C. A. convention, and the secretaries of nearly all of the Southern Y. M. C. A.'s were in town. During the same week a prominent opera company was performing at one of the theaters, and we had a dozen or more of the members of the company in the house. My room was on the second floor, and next to it was a room occupied by three of these theatrical ladies. I think one of them was the wife of the manager. There was a door between the rooms, which was always kept locked and bolted, but the transom was open. The house was filled up early in the week, and we were turning people away. On Tuesday night, I think it was, a fine-looking man of about forty walked into the hotel and introduced himself as Mr. - State secretary of the Y. M. C. A. of a State down near the gulf. I told him that the house was full, but if he cared to accept it he might use my room for the night. He thanked me courteously, and went up to the room. This was early in the evening. and later on the theatrical folks came in. The women in the room adjoining mine decided to have some refreshments, and for ten or fifteen minutes kept the porter busy carrying beer upstairs. They appeared to be having a folly good time. EVIDENCE OF A STUB FINGER.

"Things quieted down in a few minutes All at once the bell rang viciously, and the indicator pointed to the number of the room occupied by my neighbors. The porter hastened up-stairs and came back with the information that the occupant of my room was annoying the ladies. I thought of the Y. M. C. A. secretary and doubted the truth of the assertion. The women had indignantly charged the gentleman with looking through the transom.

"'Shuh, boss, dere ain't no mistake; I waw de gem'men myself,' insisted the porter. 'I seed 'im looking tro' de transum, "an one ob de ladies flung a glass o' beer in his face."

"I knew that the porter was reliable, and, while I disliked to entertain an unjust sus-picton, I half-way felt that there was something in the story. I decided to investigate, and went up to the secretary's room. I approached him guardedly, but he flew all

"'Why, sir,' be exclaimed, as he fumed and fretted, 'this is an insult; this is monstrous. Do you know who I am? Here's my card, sir; please take it to the ladies. They are certainly mistaken.

"I took the secretary's card to the manager's wife, but she declared that she had not been mistaken, and the trio vowed they would leave the hotel if the secretary was not given another room. We skirmished around and found another room, and quiet was restored. Next day the story leaked out, and the Y. M. C. A. people began to inquire all ut it. One of the executive boards took the matter up and commenced an investigation. The secretary demanded an apology from everybody about the hotel and threatened that if the investigation proceeded he would make it hot for us. But the investigation went on, and it was held in the hotel. The first witness was the

"'Did you ever see that man before?" asked the chairman of the board, pointing

"'Yes, sah,' said the porter, with a chuckle; 'saw his head sticking tro' de transum.' This was convincing evidence, retary had a stub finger one one of his hands. I took the board into the room he had occupied and pointed out the imprint of a hand in the dust on the lower part of the stub. Of curse, this was indisputable, and the evidence went no further. The secretary was let down as easily as possiadvertising dodge in the thing, and, of course, got it printed wherever they could.

"We went by train to Elsinore," she says,

"and there took a ferry boat. In about twenty minutes we were in Sweden. As we started out of Elsinore we passed the grim old castle where Hamlet lived, now used as a barracks for soldiers. We walked to the old castle and passing over the old moat and under the great walls, soon found ourselves in the castle yard. It is a beautiful building in excellent preservation. We walked out on the rampart where the ghost of Hamlet's papa was wont to cavort and scare people, ghost annoyed our We were invited to the F's for beautiful dinner given in our honor and when the frozen thing came on at the last I just wished for you. It was called 'ice cake.' My, but it was good. We have been to two old castles, Rosenborg and Fredricksborg, both built by Christian IV in 1500. They are not used as residences, but as museums, being filled with possessions of the earlier Danish Kings. Such quantities of elegant furniture, jewels, silver, brasses, china and glass! One can hardly believe in their existence. . . .

"After dinner we were all driven to the Royal Theater to witness 'Carmen.' The prima donna was a Norwegian, the daughter-in-law of the author, Bjorson. She was not paid, but was a guest of Denmark, and they treated her with such courtesy. She didn't prima donna much, but the chorus was wonderfully drilled. The King of Denmark was there in his box and I would rather have seen that good and kindly old man than the opera. His people all love and respect him and his family. . . .

"We slept between linen sheets, with a feather bed for a cover. We were as far north as Labrador in America and yet the snowdrops and an exquisite flower known the 'the daughter lily,' were blooming in the gardens. On our way north we passed many of the fjords, this country's chief charm. On the hilltops we were shown many mounds, graves of the Vikings, and from them have been taken many of the antiquities which are in the museums Think of our seeing the Vikings' graves! We were entertained at Mr. H's and such a dinner! I felt all the time as if I were a girl between the covers of one of Mrs. Wister's translations from the German. The house is filled with treasures. All around the dining room, just below the frieze, is a shelf completely filled with rare old brass and copper urns and pots and the silver was exquisite. We placidly ate out of spoons made in 1600. . . .

"In Amsterdam the old women in their caps interested me much. Some of their caps are most beautiful, made of fine lace. with large gold ornaments on the sides. We walked all over the city and had the good fortune to see three wedding parties going into the municipal buildings and we stood and gawked with the rest of the commoners. After luncheon we took a car and Watch,' being the Kohinoor, so to speak. The guard told us there were one and a half million objects to be seen in the museum."

You may not have noticed it, but his coat sleeves are worn just where they rub on the showcase, and he has three small ravelings from the ends of ribbon rolls on his vest. He is married, and has a child less than a year old. How do I know that? The second button hole of his vest has been broken and neatly repaired. Single men of his age do not have somebody to carefully look after their clothes and mend such little things. The baby? Why, that is easy enough. I smelled paregoric he had spilled on his clothes. He keeps no servant, and his wife is not in the best of health, I know that, for I see he has three packages. One contains some meat and the other a loaf of bread, while ground. from the third I saw a few grains of oatmeal drop. He is very fond of flowers, and likes to work among them in the garden. That is another easy one. Can't you see that paper of flower seed in the card pocket of his coat, and the little spot of dirt just below his knee. That is not the kind of dirt found on the streets or any place a dry goods clerk would walk during the day. This morning, before going to work, he prepared a flower bed and kneeled down while planting some seed. He touched his knee to the soft dirt, and it was too sticky to brush off, als from the building will be used for imso he had to leave it there." Just then the car stopped and the cynic

POPULAR POLITICAL ECONOMY.

Market Flooded with Books Imitating the "Coin" Style.

By a glance over the counters of the book stores and news stands it is observed that the market is flooded with literature on socalled financial and social questions. The success financially of Coin's book on silver probably has been an inducement to other ambitious writers to enter a similar field. opinions on money and social questions, the dialogue method seeming very popular. A majority of the books are Populistic in tendency, just as was Coin's, and they attack the so-called money power, which is alleged to be responsible for all the woes of the American people. Nearly all the books are bound in paper with fancy covers, and all contain caricatures such as appeared in Coin. It seems popular and quite the thing to picture John Bull and the Rothschilds and the monopolists as having Uncle Sam by the throat. The books fill a field of a popular bolitical economy, and the man who will read one of them is said to be the kind who will buy everything of a similar nature published. A local book dealer sized up the market for such works as follows: "There is a large element in this country

The latter appeals to a popular weakness, and a man who wants to stand forth as an original thinker can digest them readily and then make a good impression among certain others. Those people who spend their time reading them are made to feel that they are actually learning why they have so hard a time in getting along."

SENT HIS SON-IN-LAW THE BILL.

A Father Who Objected to Losing Value of His Daughter's Education.

A very interesting case is reported from one of the counties whose boundary line touches that of Marion county. The case is county before mentioned.

Secretary Hildreth has had it suggested | The farmer is a prosperous one, as are all pation of milking cows and reading books to a degree not often observed in a country

> The young woman longed for an education. She was ambitious. She had an idea that she could go forth in the world and make an honorable living and position for herself. Her father, pleased at her ambitions, sacrificed much to send her to a university where she could be taught. The university is known throughout the country and an attendance there is equal to a diploma from many another school. The young woman entered upon her duties with a zeal and steadfastness of purpose. She attracted attention, especially that of a young man who was preparing himself for the practice of medicine. This young man had the desire to do something grand for mankind, so he consecrated his life to missionary work. To make a long story short, the young woman from Indiana and the young "medic" met and became acquainted with each other. The acquaintance ripened into the beautiful love found only at a co-educational institution, and they were engaged to be married. The father, the Indiana farmer, was apprised of the affair. He did not take kindly to the thought of his only daughter going to Africa as a missionary, probably to be devoured by cannibals. He objected with all the parental obstinacy of the centuries. Love as usual took its own course and the only daughter and the young "medic" were married and two lives became consecrated to the missionary cause. The father did not attend the wedding. More than that, he forbade his daughter to visit him or even speak to him. It did not please his soul to ponder that he had reared a daughter, sacrificed much to educate her. only to have her marry a missionary and bury herself with him in the darkest of dark Africa. He wrote his objectionable son-in-law a note in which he figured up the expense to which he had been put in educating his daughter to be the wife of a mission ary. He sent the son-in-law the bill for the university course. The young man acknowledged the bill, saying his wife was worth more than all the world to him, but were i to save his life and those of all the heathen in the world he could not meet the obliga tion. The young missionary and his bride started for Africa on their honeymoon without a father's blessing, and no word has been received since to tell whether they are alive or dead.
